Harilal Gandhi (1888-1948) was the eldest son of Mahatma Gandhi, the leader of India's independence movement. He was a complex and troubled figure, who struggled to live up to the expectations of his father and the demands of the freedom struggle.

Early Life

Harilal was born in Porbandar, Gujarat, in 1888. He was the eldest of four children, and his father was a successful lawyer. Harilal was a bright student, and he excelled in his studies. He went to England to study law, but he returned to India after a few years, disillusioned with the British legal system.

Struggle for Independence

Harilal was deeply involved in the Indian independence movement. He was a close associate of his father, and he participated in many of the major campaigns of the freedom struggle. However, Harilal was also a controversial figure. He was known for his outspoken views, and he was often critical of his father's leadership.

Personal Life

Harilal's personal life was troubled. He married three times, and all of his marriages ended in divorce. He also had a number of extramarital affairs. Harilal struggled with alcohol and gambling, and he was often in debt.

Later Years

Harilal's later years were marked by poverty and obscurity. He died in Mumbai in 1948, at the age of 60. He was largely forgotten by history, but in recent years there has been a renewed interest in his life and work.
